Excerpt from Lecture Delivered Before the Maryland Institute for the Promotion of the Mechanic Arts, on Tuesday Evening, March 20, 1855 The Institution over which you preside must enlist in its favor the warmest sympathies of every lover of humanity. Agriculture and the mechanic arts may be regarded as twin sisters, born at the same birth, and co-workers in all that relates to the good of man, his comfort, his refinement, his civilization. Without the first, the last has no active existence, - with out the last, the earth is an unreclaimed wilderness, within whose dense forests no trace of improvement exists. Working perpetually together, they have their type in the Castor and Pollux of the ancient mythology. By their joint labors they reclaim the wilderness, cause the earth to give forth its blessings, build the populous city, construct the noble ship and freight it for distant ports, and make available in the great work of civilization, the primeval elements of fire, air and water. The Curse pronounced upon our race, on the expulsion of our great progenitors from the garden, is almost annihilated through the substitution of manual labor by machinery, which seems often, in the complexity and yet perfect accuracy of its operations, to be endowed-with the principles of life and motion as inherent in itself, and independent of the will of man. Nor does the genius which presides over the department of the mechanic arts, confine itself to the fabrication of mechanical instruments and machines devoted to the great purposes of every day life. It springs forth into the boundless fields of the imagination wings its flight through the mists of long past ages, and revivifies and...
